

Stillness in the Storm Editorial

Propaganda, social engineering, and mass mind influence are facts of life in the modern age. The Deep State-run media use their power of influence to manipulate the minds of the masses, convincing them of false realities that act to control their behavior through manipulating their thinking. The [Christchurch shooting] is one such example of an engineered event that is false in that the promoted version doesn't match the available evidence. Generally speaking, we could refer to this as a false flag, using the colloquial definition. To be clear, a false flag isn't always a hoaxed event—in most cases, real people died, however, the story is used in a false way to promote a Deep State agenda. More precisely, this is the manipulation of public opinion through the dissemination of false news stories. Operation Mockingbird and Northwoods are two admitted projects run by the intelligence agencies with the purpose of manipulating public opinion through the media. The realities of modern-day mass mind influence are critical to understand so as to avoid manipulation on the part of the Deep State. While it would, obviously, be beneficial if these things didn't happen at all, the fact that they do offers individuals the opportunity to gain wisdom in discernment. It is folly to blindly believe anything—everything should be carefully analyzed and questioned for how well it matches reality. With the urge for discernment in hand, an individual can begin to develop their epistemological skills, which are pivotal to gain intrinsic knowledge with the capacity for expansion, as opposed to extrinsic knowledge which becomes more crystallized and disempowering over time.
